Introduction

An education which fails to inculcate human values and professional ethics in the students is as futile as the land which produces only weed. A very cursory look at the present human condition reveals personal, social and environmental problems, such as depression; corruption and violence; and pollution, respectively. This means that our present education system might be producing high number of professionals but they are the individuals who lack human values and a sense of ethics. Alarming, the number of such educated individuals without values and ethics is increasing. It is thus, the responsibility of the teachers to ensure that their students do not lack in human values and who are successful professionals with ethics and integrity. In order to make this possible the teachers themselves need to learn to integrate their teaching with human values and professional ethics.

human values such as trust and respect for better harmony in their interpersonal relationships. If human values are truly realized then it will bring happiness to the individual, prosperity in the family, fearlessness in the society and coexistence with nature.
